In the 1970s, Italian microbiologist Francesco Chiarugi identified the first pathogen associated with sepsis. We have since learned that microorganisms are but a part of the host response to an infection. For more than 30 years the Sepsis-1 study has contributed to increased awareness of sepsis and septic shock. Subsequent developments improved the diagnosis, but mortality has not changed. Current thinking that sepsis and septic shock are a systemic inflammatory response syndrome has brought hope for new diagnostic and therapeutic opportunities. The purpose of this article is to provide an overview of septic shock from the historical perspective to the present. It also discusses the use of biomarkers in sepsis and septic shock. It argues that a single biomarker will not cover the multi-organ failure in sepsis and has suggested that future biomarker research should cover organ function and coagulation abnormalities. This may have therapeutic and diagnostic implications.Although I trust the honesty of over 4,000 readers, I can’t say that I expect to get convincing evidence from you, on anything, when you’re promoting information like this, so I must raise the following question: “Does anybody actually believe this?” In the same way that they claim that using real names shows that my views are “mainstream” and “accepted” and “broadly viewed”, will they tell us that using fake names shows that my views are “out of the mainstream” and “not accepted”? And what will happen when it comes out that the imposter and snake-oil salesman actually has a degree in ethics? Do they also drop the degree when trying to sell us that there are Christians in that Iraqi church who are REAL Christians? WARNING, for people who haven’t done so yet: This is material from a Christian fundamentalist (also
